ANSWER TO SATURDAY'S PUZZLE:

CAROLYN HAX Tired of mom's defense of neglectful ex-partner

BY CAROLYN HAX tellme@washpost.com

Dear Carolyn: My ex-husband and I split up three years ago. He was cheating and wanted to start a new life with his pregnant girlfriend. He hardly sees or calls our 12-year-old daughter. When he first married, his excuse was the pregnancy, then it was the new baby. Then it was the pandemic. I try to arrange visits and Zoom calls, but he just doesn't make time for her.

I've been relaying all his reasons and trying to stay upbeat so her feelings aren't hurt and she doesn't turn against him. She finally broke down crying and screamed at me for "always defending him."

I'm so tired of this. I'm furious at him. Behind the scenes I'm always fighting with him about his neglect. He says I'm jealous of his happiness and calls me a "Karen." When do I get a break?

— Furious

Furious: Your daughter gave you one and you didn't take it — plus a blueprint for what she needs from you. Your "trying to stay upbeat" is well-intentioned but not meeting her emotional needs. She wants truth, not defenses:

"I'm so sorry. I know you wanted this." And: "Of course you're hurt and angry. I think what he's doing is wrong." Validate her. And, respect her, too.

Dear Carolyn: At a happy hour, I met someone who has my dream job and seems to have lucked into it relatively easily. I am unhappy in my non-dream job and working toward changing it.

I reached out to her the day after the happy hour to ask more questions about the job, she gave me some more information, and then I reached out again to see if she'd be

Am I a Creep?: You have gotten as much from her as she is willing to give. Please take that for an answer.
